15 Explore the Mayan ruins in Tulum, Mexico

16 It is hard to know who recited the first Om or unfurled the first yoga mat upon Tulum's epic beach. But it is true that Tulum, on the southern edge of Mexico's Riviera Maya (and a healthy distance from the bunkerlike developments there) is a hot spot for yoga tourists. Don't be afraid if you don't know your downward dog from your dolphin: it's more of a yoga aesthetic that prevails here, a mood and a look that draws misty-eyed boomer professionals (heavy on the fashion and publishing industries) with fond memories of youthful forays to Thailand for Ko Phangan's full moon festival — or maybe just those who wish they'd hit that Lonely Planet trail when their knees could still take it. Tulum is a strip of beach and jungle peppered with stylish haute-bohemian huts that are off the grid and just a few hours by plane from New York or Los Angeles. And instead of hallucinogens to bend your mind, there is stunning (and pricey) cuisine that reflects the eclectic tastes of the expats — from Italy, France, Germany and the two coasts of the United States — who have settled here.

3 Amsterdam, Netherlands

The Netherlands's largest metropolis has always been one of the continent's most progressive and cosmopolitan capitals. Stroll, boat, or bike along the city's canals, lined with gabled houses, to experience one of Europe's best preserved, photogenic, and intact historic city centers, or visit the Dutch master paintings in the Rijksmuseum. Run through the galleries of the western canal ring, dine at one of the city's creative global kitchens, catch a contemporary dance performance at the Muziektheater, or visit the revitalized East Docklands area, which offers a study in sleek contemporary architecture and smart urban planning.
